ABSTRACT

Information is provided on family practice clerkships (25 available at the time of publication in California and 1 in Nevada) to assist students in choosing a clerkship. For each clerkship, information is presented on the following: school/course, residency affiliation, site, address and phone number, clerkship director, clerkship coordinator, contact person, course information, student's experience, faculty and facilities, patient population, student's evaluation of clerkship, and miscellaneous features. Specific course information includes: application period, length of clerkship rotations, number of students per rotation/block, language requirement, prerequisites for clerkship, and number of entering residents that completed a clerkship at the site. Additional information is given on: goals and objectives for the student, model 1-week schedule of clerk, number of patients seen by student per day, percent of student's time spent in inpatient and outpatient care, and whether there are family practice conferences and, if so, the typical content. Information on the clinical layout of the facilities and specific types of service areas (i.e, x-ray, pharmacy, patient education facilities) is included. A chart indicates types and number of providers, contact with students, and whether the provider is responsible for direct supervision. The age distribution, racial mix, and socioeconomic distribution of the patient population are indicated, and commonly stated strengths and weaknesses of the clerkship, as perceived by students, are listed. Introduction

Medical students interested in family practice take clerkships in their third or fourth year either to find out what family practice is all about or to check out a program which they are considering applying to for residency training.

There are now forty-one family practice residency programs in California and most of them offer a family practice clerkship based in Family Health Centers. In addition there are a few other clerkship sites in community clinics affiliated with medical schools, to which students rotate on a regular basis.

This manual provides information about most of the clerkships available at this time and will be helpful to students choosing a clerkship. As well as information about student responsibilities and activities, the manual describes the clinic, its patients, staff, faculty, and any special features of the clerkship. The director and contact person are listed for each clerkship site.

The manual should also be valuable to family practice faculty who are advising students about elective clerkships and residency programs.

This manual has been a collaborative project of the faculty and staff of the various divisions and departments of Family Practice at the California Medical schools. We hope it will be useful to all using it.
